The data in a file is stored in a format established by any application created the file (i.e., organized the data) and usually must be read by the same or similar program that can interpret the format and present the data to the user on the computer screen. So don't panic if you accidentally reformat a disk that has useful data. The low-level format also determines which type of disk controller can access the disk (for example, RLL or MFM). For example, word processing applications can format text, which involves specifying the font, alignment, margins, and other properties.
